"The worst thing that you can do in Photoshop is to try to clean up a previously edited image. This has the effect of putting the problem back into the original image, and it's a complex challenge to isolate the 'dirty' information and re-assign it to its rightful place within the new image. What this approach does is just create more work for you and a less-than-ideal image. As a result, it's safer to treat every image as a new one to be created from the beginning." — Tim Grey, _Author of_ The Internet Photographer's Handbook Photoshop is used every day by designers and artists, in business, academia, and in their daily lives. It is used in an endless variety of applications: retouching photographs; designing clothing, advertising, and packaging; creating billboards; and painting murals, logos, and other art. Figure 3.5 : Using the free Google Image searching tool, I found this photo that my client wanted a new logo for.

Comanche Nation White buffalo still roam free on the Cheyenne reservation in Oklahoma. The bull left Cheyenne land through a small border gate and after months of searching, agents captured him in August 2007. Photograph courtesy of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service Native Americans once lived on land in the western United States and Canada that is now used by a different race. The West was once home to thousands of Native Americans who thrived in rich hunting grounds with a variety of game, including bison, elk, pronghorn, mule deer, and caribou. Today the lands on which Native Americans once lived are used by settlers. So-called "fishing people," who first moved to the region in the mid-1800s, changed how Native Americans live. In the 1800s, Native Americans in the western United States lived on small reservations of approximately 10,000 acres that were established by the U.S. Government. These reservations stretched hundreds of miles along the western plains and were home to thousands of Native Americans. These reservations were in places like the Great Plains and the mountains of the West. Reservations began as part of a treaty between the United States and the Native Americans. The U.S. agreed to give Native Americans land in return for educating them and protecting them from settlers. Reservation land was set aside for Native Americans so that they could grow crops and raise livestock. However, settlers were allowed to hunt game on the reservations without having to get permission from the Indian tribes. The hunt for bison became a blood sport People call bison the "white buffalo" because they are a lighter color than other buffalo. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service—the federal agency that protects endangered species—says the head of a bison is worth around $10,000. In the 1800s settlers from Europe and Asia arrived in North America. They brought with them ideas and ideas about how to control land and how to care for animals. They learned about selective breeding to improve their herds. They also learned about using horses to hunt. People were looking for a way to make money from bison. Some wanted to sell the meat. Others wanted to sell the hides, which the settlers had picked up from the coastal regions of the United States and sold to Europeans. However, the most coveted part of the bison was the head and the hide

Q: How to access interface methods in Java? Assuming there is a class, A: public interface A { void methodA(); void methodB(); } And a class B: public class B extends A implements A { public void methodA(){ //do something } public void methodB(){ //do something } } I am getting a compilation error in Eclipse: "B must either be declared abstract or implement abstract method methodA() in A" Why do I get this error? A: The reason is that in Java, interfaces cannot declare abstract methods. Hence, if you have an interface containing abstract methods, you'll need to rewrite the interface to remove those abstract methods (or at least mark them private, which is good enough in your case). You can still provide an implementation of the abstract methods in the implementing class, and have it satisfy the interface's contract. For example, your interface could be rewritten like this: public interface A { void methodA(); void methodB(); } public interface A_noAbstractMethods { void methodA(); void methodB(); } public class A_noAbstractMethodsImpl implements A_noAbstractMethods { @Override public void methodA() { // do something } @Override public void methodB() { // do something } } // Then, use an interface that does not have any abstract methods public interface B extends A { } A: If you really want to do this you can redefine a class as abstract but with the same name as the interface - so if the interface is A you would declare the class B to be abstract A. public abstract class A { ... } abstract class B extends A { ... } Q: How to show div on button click using jquery? I have one problem, I
